About This Trip •

The Dhauladhar mountain range, a part of the Himalayan chain extending from Chamba and Kangra to Mandi in Himachal Pradesh, is known for its rugged terrain with steep rocky peaks and sheer slopes. While the higher elevations are often snow-covered and dotted with large boulders, the lower ranges are rich in diverse flora and fauna, attracting mountain enthusiasts.

The range is home to seven captivating high-altitude lakes—Nag Dal, Lam Dal, Kali Kund, Kareri Lake, Chanderkoop Lake (Moon Lake), Sukh Dal, and Dam Ghodi Dal. These lakes are steeped in local mythology and considered sacred by the local Gaddi, who undertake pilgrimages to visit them.

The Dhauladhar 7 Lakes trek offers a challenging adventure through steep and rocky terrain, with rewarding views of pristine lakes and lush meadows. The journey begins in Kareri village and leads up to Minkiani Pass, reaching Lam Dal Lake at an altitude of 4343 meters. Due to Lam Dal Lake's sacred status, camping is prohibited, preserving its untouched beauty. The trail, passing through oak and rhododendron forests, offers spectacular views of the Dhauladhar and Pir Panjal ranges. The trek is enhanced by Hanuman Tibba, the highest peak in the Dhauladhar range, making it a serene and picturesque adventure.

The Nag Dal Lake, also called the Cobra Lake, is believed to have been visited by the King of Alwar Raja Bhagsu, as per the advice of his priest, to bring water from the holy lake to have rain in his drought-ridden kingdom. He was so pleased to see the lake with plenty of water that, with his magical powers, he filled all of the water in a pot. While Raja was in a deep sleep in the Dhauladhar Mountains, Nag Devta was on his routine visit to Lake Nag Dal. Furious at finding the empty lake, he traced Raja Bhagsu's footsteps and challenged him to war. In the fight, Raja Bhagsu was severely wounded and dropped his magical pot, and as a result, Lake Nag Dal was once again filled with water. While Raja was breathing his last breath, he sincerely prayed to Nag Devta, who granted him the wish to curb the drought in his kingdom. Now there's enough water in Ajmer. Nag Devta also named this place after Raja Bhagsu, which is prefixed with his name as Bhagsu Nag. Hundreds of people now visit this lake for a holy dip, and people worship Nag Devta on Janmashtami.

The Lam Dal Lake: Lam Dal, situated at an elevation of 3,900 meters, is the largest and deepest lake in the area, reachable via Minkiani Pass, Indrahar Pass, and Gaj Pass. The trek to Lam Dal begins in Kareri village via Kareri Lake, progressing through Barie, Drakund, and a 14-kilometre hike to the lake. The journey showcases alpine meadows and glacier basins, offering spectacular valley views and insights into the slow-paced local lifestyle. The Minkiani Pass route is particularly noted for its scenic beauty, lush landscapes, and diverse flora and fauna, making it a remarkable trekking experience that rivals the splendour of the lakes.

Kali Kund Lake, known for its clear blue waters and mystical aura, is often less frequented than other regional lakes. This makes it a perfect destination for those seeking solitude and natural beauty. The lake is named "Kali Kund" due to its dark, mysterious waters, believed to have spiritual significance.

Chanderkup Dal, also known as Moon Lake, is renowned for its striking frozen appearance during early summer, with chunks of ice often floating on its surface. For the best view, visiting towards the end of May when the lake is frozen is ideal. The trek from Nag Dal to Chanderkup Dal spans approximately 3 kilometres and typically takes 2 to 4 hours. At Chanderkup Dal, situated at 12,000 feet, you can enjoy the lake's serene beauty before continuing your journey to the next destination, Dham Godi Dal.

Dham Godi Dal is a lake that feeds into the Beas River, which meanders through the Kangra Valley. To reach Dham Godi Dal from Chanderkup, you need to cover an additional 2 to 3 kilometres. This trek, which includes a steep ascent, typically takes about 3 to 4 hours. Once you arrive, you can set up camp near the lake.

Kali Dal Lake, the temple of Mata Kali, also known as Mata Shakti, is a revered site featuring a famous lake called Kali Dal. While the temple welcomes all visitors, only women can perform worship rituals to Mata Kali, as the goddess represents female power (Shakti). However, everyone can freely explore the area. Visitors are advised that taking a dip in the lake is strictly prohibited, a rule to remember while visiting this sacred place.

Kareri Lake is a breathtaking trekking destination in the Dhauladhar range of the Himalayas, standing at 3,300 meters. Known for its serene natural beauty, the lake is best visited from April to May when it is not frozen, offering stunning views of waterfalls, glaciers, and lush greenery. The 8 km trek, which takes around 5-6 hours, is moderately challenging, with the initial stretch being particularly tough, passing through forested paths, rocky terrain, and river crossings. Trekkers can also visit a temple dedicated to Lord Shiva and Shakti on a hill overlooking the lake. Though camping near the lake has been banned due to pollution concerns, camps can still be set up nearby, and hikers are encouraged to be environmentally conscious. With unpredictable weather, especially during winter and rainy seasons, carrying warm clothes and trekking with a guide is advised for safety. Kareri Lake trek is a must for anyone seeking adventure and tranquillity in the Himalayas, with every step offering a chance to connect with nature's untouched beauty.
